Pharmaceutical solutions are often used to combat conditions requiring daily administration of medication to a patient, such as diabetes. The pharmaceutical compositions can contain one or more medications, optionally depending on the condition, e.g., controlling blood sugar levels in the case of diabetes. For example, a patient with diabetes can purchase a sugar pill each day for the required dosage of a medication. Some types of medication, e.g., insulin, require a patient to monitor various physiological conditions, such as blood sugar levels, throughout the day. Insulin is a key medication for controlling blood sugar levels. Many patients are urged to test their blood sugar levels several times a day, and record this information. In many cases, patients keep the daily records in a specialized blood-sugar-testing device or meter, e.g., a device or meter which stores a blood glucose test strip or strip bag and a blood-test-sugar test strip or strip bag. For example, when a patient is to take insulin, he or she can test a blood sample, record the test results, and provide a report to a healthcare provider. The healthcare provider can determine if a particular amount of insulin should be administered. The patient can repeat the blood sugar test for tracking purposes, e.g., to evaluate the effectiveness of the insulin dose. The patient can perform the required tests and record the results and/or make these records available to a healthcare provider for evaluation and future reference. There are a variety of possible shortcomings associated with the foregoing approach. For example, one shortcoming is that storing blood-sugar test strips in a blood-sugar testing device can subject the test strips to repeated handling and exposure to potentially damaging environmental conditions (e.g., humidity and temperature). A second shortcoming is that the blood glucose testing devices typically store the blood-sugar test strips and associated supplies separately from the other medical supplies (e.g., insulin, syringes) which the patient may need to monitor and test daily. A third shortcoming is that the blood glucose testing devices are typically bulky and inconvenient to transport and to store, particularly for overnight use.
